

THE CREATIVE BEING

Peggy Thayer, Ph.D.

The creative being inside is the voice that brings the next word to mind, the next image to sight. It seems there is a vast well inside whose bottom leads downward and eventually outward to touch the universe, itself. A universe that actually can never truly be touched, just known through the images that come forward, that fall into my own personal well.

...Sometimes it seems that this creative being is a force, a connective energy, that keeps the invisible thread of image-making continuous. It is a playful, seeking force. It takes no effort for it to continue. This force is not the images themselves, the teachings themselves, the content, the expression, or even the well. This force is the stream that would keep streaming whether there were words to hear, pictures to visualize, myself as a vehicle, or others as recipients. To contact this force, I just start here, with the surface, what comes to me right now, in whatever form or content, just following the string of words, the stream of visions. Just following seems to give it life.

Beyond each word is another word, beyond each image, another image. Into the well, deeper, to get to the source. Beyond my personal creative being, I feel something Greater. As I follow, I listen, and as I receive, more follows; this is the creative being in action. I can feel its power, but never really know its form. It seems chameleon-like, becoming words and images as it moves. Always pointing towards something more than these words and images...
