

MARTIN HEIDEGGER ON HUMANISM

Sunnie D. Kidd

The presuppositions for this presentation are:

- 1) Although fundamental ontology and humanism are different they nevertheless share a common ground.
- 2) Every human endeavor involves values and philosophical presuppositions.
- 3) There is no hard and fast principle of division between philosophy and psychology.

Heidegger in the essay “Letter on Humanism” says that every humanism is grounded in a metaphysics or in the making of itself its own ground, becomes a metaphysics. This makes sense for a fundamental ontologist. We first ask about Being to explain the things-that-are. With another twist Heidegger says that to determine the nature of the human being it is proper for every metaphysics to be humanistic. The failure of humanism is to get at the fundamental question of the Dasein's truth of Being. Humanism is self-affirming. It is the opposite of true Dasein. This is objectivization of subjectum. What is to be accomplished in this presentation is to reflect upon whether or not Being may be brought into expression in another way.

The inquiry into beings as beings is the motif of metaphysics. For Heidegger, Being itself is never graspable objectively. It makes comprehensible to us how we have access to entities. The relation of Being to the nature of human being is Being itself is the relationship. The “Letter on Humanism” revolves around the existence of human being. It is not an attempt to understand human being as one living being among others. Heidegger wants to surpass every form of humanism, in so far as humanism puts the human being in center stage.

Heidegger takes the stance that philosophy never arises out of science or through it. This would be to let the modern conception of science infiltrate philosophy. Heidegger dispenses with Humanism. Heidegger stands-with ecstatic nature, stands (static) outside (ec-) within the light of Being. This is Being-in-the-world. Being-in-the-world is Being-in also a standing-out (ex-sistence). This is the ground for awareness and responsibility, an openness to the world, a transcendence of the world. Being-in-the-world is an empty formula. It says nothing about human beings only about human being.

For Heidegger, Christianity is a humanism. Everything comes down to the salvation of the human soul. All doctrines of Humanism coincide from the view of an already-established interpretation of nature, history and world.

Heidegger puts a disclaimer on any movement of thought, on what has been said in Being and Time, about the word “man” the impersonal one to sociology. That “man exists” answers the question of the essence of “man.” Insofar as “man” ex-sists being-there endures taking the There as the clearing of Being within “care.” The question remains whether human being finds what is appropriate to its essence to correspond to destiny. This is ecstatic existence experienced as “care.”

Heidegger says Humanism has lost its meaning through the realization that its essence is metaphysical. Every Humanism is founded in or converted to metaphysics. Every determination of the essence of human being presupposes the interpretation of beings without asking the question of the truth of Being. The first Humanism presupposes the essence of human being as the animal rationale which is a metaphysical interpretation. Heidegger attempts to restore Humanism. Humanum points to humanitas which is the essence of human being. This essence rests in ex-sistence. This essence derives from Being itself. The essence of “man” is essential for the truth of Being.

Heidegger is for the guardianship of the truth of Being and is very strict in dictating as to what should be thought. Heidegger is a policeman taking Humanism into the custody of Being. The thought in Being and Time is not meant in passing to move into sociology. The metaphysical must be based on the question of the truth of Being. Heidegger saves Humanism by absorbing it. This means there is no Humanism.

Through the characterization of something as value, for Heidegger, it loses its dignity. Valuing does not let things be. To think counter to values does not mean to plunge the existent into worthlessness and nullity. Heidegger’s concern is with the question of the truth of Being. There is an urgency for an ethics, especially in an age of technology. Ethics dwells in the abode of human being. The thought which thinks of the truth of Being is at the source of ethics. But this thinking is not ethics. Heidegger says in a concise and precise statement: Fundamental ontology attempts to go back to the basic essence, from which the thought of the truth of Being derives.

For Heidegger, Ontology thinks being in its Being. If the truth of Being is not thought there is no ground. Formulating different questions removes thinking from the ontology of metaphysics. Assigning directions come from Being itself not from the handiwork of human reason. Being is the shelter in view of its own truth shelters “man.” Heidegger says specifically: Language is the house of Being and the dwelling of human beings.

Looking at others and their ability to be an influence upon the development and direction of the self begins with the sociality of our existence and its irrefutable primordality. Heidegger's analysis of the "they self" and the "authentic self" can be seen as highly sensitive to shared living. One result of this social nature is that we may find ourselves Being-with-others and yet experience a feeling of alienation. This is only one way of Being-with-others. Dasein is essentially Being-with. Dasein's Being-alone is Being-with in the world. Being-alone is a deficient mode of Being-with. The experience of alienation is a deficient mode of Being-with. Others are always already there even though our experience may set us apart from them. This displays the power of imagination in that even though no one is near "they" are with us because we are in a world where Being-with is an existential statement as to its essence. Dasein as Being-with lets the Dasein of Others be encountered in its world. One's own Dasein has the essential structure of Being-with. In this way Dasein-with is encounterable for Others. In discourse Being-with becomes explicitly shared. It is through discourse with others that we come to know and understand ourselves and the world in which we live.

In this way Being is brought into expression in a different way. Caring is a natural unfolding which emerges from within life. Living life centered around caring for appropriate others, one of whom is oneself, is living the meaning of one's life. This would be a self-to-be-with-others.

Heidegger's disclosure of what it means to be a human does not include religion or theology. In speaking of the nature of the human being it is both philosophical and psychological. Psychology has its ground in philosophical assumptions regarding the nature of the human being. Yet the proper turn of psychology is to clear the discord among philosophies of the human being. Philosophy is not venturesomeless. The nature of reality, the good life, how one obtains knowledge, these assumptions influence the questions the psychologist asks and the interpretation of research findings. Without assumptions and values there would be no questions to ask or goals to pursue. In turn, there is no value unless one is committed to it.
